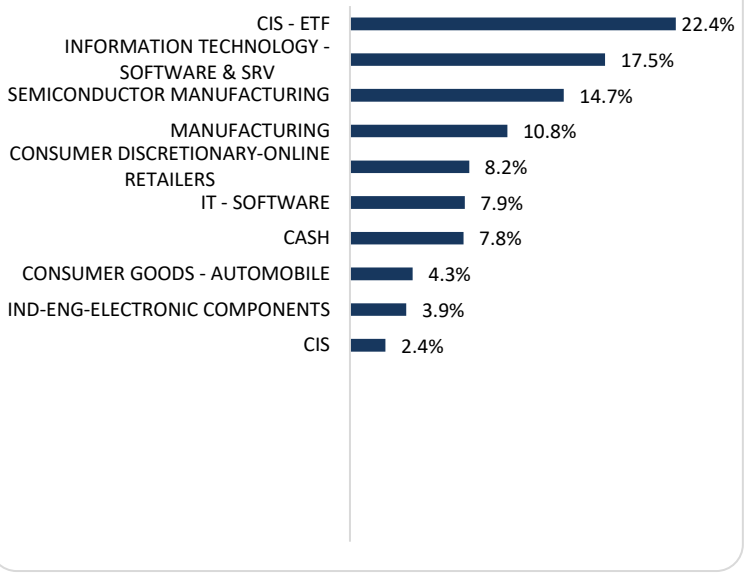
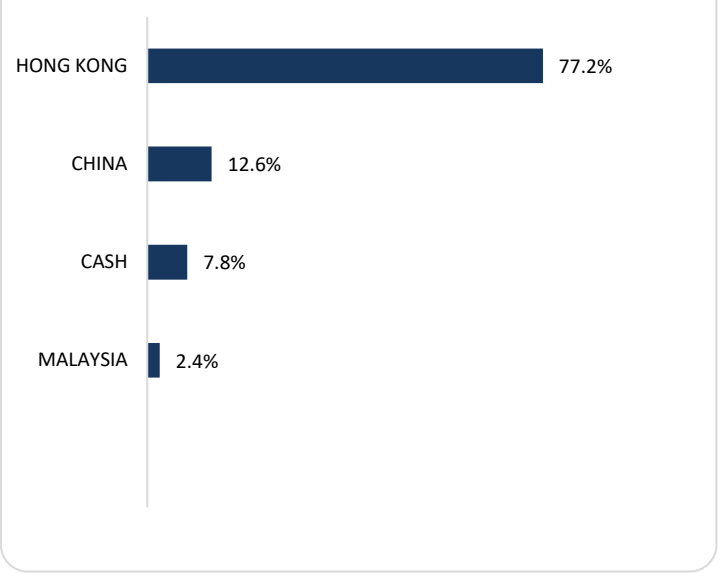
ASSET & SECTOR ALLOCATION (% OF NAV)





FUND MANAGER'S REPORT

China and Hong Kong technology equities came under renewed pressure in September, with the Hang Seng TECH Index declining 7.9% in HKD terms (-7.0% in MYR terms), underperforming the broader Hang Seng Index, which fell approximately 3.7%. The sell-off was notably China-specific, as Taiwan and South Korea technology markets remained positive during the month.

Market sentiment was weighed by elevated U.S. Treasury yields, a stronger U.S. dollar and renewed uncertainty surrounding semiconductor restrictions. The extension of the U.S.-China trade truce to 10 January 2027 removed an immediate tariff deadline but provided limited upside, as no major tariff reductions or firm commitments on rare earths and advanced chips were announced. Technology stocks also weakened following reports surrounding potential access to advanced Nvidia chips and further U.S. restrictions on Chinese components used in AI data centres.

Nevertheless, underlying economic indicators showed tentative improvement. China's manufacturing PMI returned to expansionary territory at 50.1, while production rose to a nine-month high. However, weak domestic demand and property activity remain key concerns.

We remain constructive on China's technology sector over the longer term, supported by policy support, China's growing AI and advanced-manufacturing capabilities and more attractive valuations following the correction. In the near term, however, elevated U.S. yields, semiconductor-policy uncertainty and subdued domestic consumption are likely to sustain volatility. We therefore favour selectively adding to high-quality technology names on weakness, with October's Fifth Plenum and upcoming economic data serving as important catalysts.
